Semi-Private

Tony Towle

If you’re dressed in white and being importuned by sick people, you might be a nurse or other health-care professional. If you feel you’ve been pierced with harpoons and are lying on a beach listening to the sand and not hearing the ocean you could be mistaken. But if, in the middle of the forest you come upon your arch-foe finishing a sandwich and drinking from your skull, you will know with certainty: you have taken a wrong turn in life.
Coming home from school that day you should have gone left at the dry goods store, followed Elm Street to the edge of town and then set off on the dash through the proliferations of the moment to the interim haven of the future. This must have been the work of the sorceress in red, whose existence may have come to fruition that very morning — you overheard whispers in the garden, there, just outside the window, while enchanted flies buzzed in the heat.